At a company seven people were discussing the distribution of work. All the members were actively participating in the discussion but one, Takashi. Takashi was sleeping and he started to snore. The other members looked at him, thinking that he is a problem worker.

Finally the leader of the meeting suggested that Takashi do all the work. The other members agreed on the idea.

The next morning, Takashi came to the office to find that so many files and documents had been put on his desk. He was puzzled and dropped his bag on the floor.

In the teachers' room, the teachers have a meeting. They discuss how to share the work, but one teacher is sleeping. He even drops his head on the table and snores loudly. The chairperson of the meeting hits on a good idea that the snoring teacher should do all the work. Everybody there agrees. The next morning, the teacher who kept sleeping during the meeting is surprised to see a big pile of paper on his desk and regrets his behavior.
