| 研究分野                   | As studies of rhetoric have expanded beyond the artful use of oratory with the development of communication technologies, my interest in persuasive communication has expanded to symbols, sounds, colors, and images. Interest in the tools, techniques and signs of persuasion and coercion developed when I began noticing in the 1990s patterns of manipulation and deception in corporate media and the effects that cognitive framing had on the perception of threats to nations, communities, and civil rights. My work integrates research in linguistics, psychology, and communication theory to describe ways in which power centers organize and undertake propaganda campaigns to engineer mass consent for policies and actions across cultures. The aim is to stimulate exploration of key questions: to what extent can disinterested observers understand public discourse as part of a larger experiment in which dominant social, political, and economic forces shape perception to influence thought, speech, and behavior? Can observers extrapolate useful data from public opinion that verifies the conditions of the experiment, who the experimenters are, the subjects and control groups? Can the observer describe the mechanisms that shape perception and opinion? |                                                                                    |
